NEWARK – A Union City bodega owner was sentenced to 50 months in prison today for illegally transporting more than $1 million to Mexico over a four-year period, money which in significant part represented the earnings of Mexican women who had been smuggled into the United States and put to work as prostitutes, U.S. Attorney Christopher J. Christie announced.

Jose Luis Notario, 52, of Union City, was also ordered to pay a $10,000 fine by U.S. District Judge Joseph E. Irenas. He remains in custody, where he has been since his arrest in May 2006.

Notario pleaded guilty in federal court in Newark on June 15, 2007, according to Assistant U.S. Attorney Leslie F. Schwartz. Notario pleaded guilty to a three-count Information charging him with the operation of an illegal money transmitting business, bulk-cash smuggling, and harboring of illegal aliens.

Notario admitted at his plea hearing that at least as early as about January 2002 through about April 2006 he had operated an illegal money transmitting business from Mi Pequeno Rincon de Mexico, a bodega owned by him and located at 4308 New York Avenue in Union City. Notario further admitted to having made more than two hundred round trip flights between the United States and Mexico during which he transported money for a four-percent fee.

Notario also admitted that he had conversations in March and May 2005 with a cooperating witness during which he agreed to transport $5,000 and $15,000, respectively to individuals in Mexico. He further admitted that in June 2005, he had falsely told Customs inspectors at Newark Liberty International Airport that he was in possession of $4,000 in currency. A subsequent search of his luggage, however, revealed an additional $14,100 divided into 12 envelopes with the names of the intended recipients.

Notario also admitted that he had harbored more than six but less than 24 individuals whom he knew to be illegal aliens at a building owned by him at 318 42nd Street in Union City.

The charges against Notario were part of an investigation into a large-scale smuggling and trafficking ring operating out of Union City. During the course of the investigation, it was determined that there were a number of families in the vicinity of San Miguel Tenancingo, Mexico, who smuggled Mexican females into the United States where they were placed to work as prostitutes. The smuggled women ranged in age from 17 to their mid-twenties.

Once the females were smuggled into the United States, many of them were transported to the east coast, primarily to Union City and Queens, New York. Many of the females temporarily resided in “safe houses” with their traffickers or pimps. From there, the females were sent by passenger van to brothels in Maryland, Virginia and other east coast locations.

Typically the females worked as prostitutes at a single location for one week, generally from Monday to Sunday. They were then transported, usually on Sunday evenings, back to the “safe houses” maintained by their traffickers, where they replenished their supplies for the upcoming week. The women routinely turned over their earnings to their traffickers who sent the money back to the trafficker’s families in Mexico.

As Judge Irenas stated at sentencing, Notario’s building at 318 42nd Street in Union City was the “epicenter” of the prostitution operation. Through the use of surveillances and trash retrievals at that address, it was revealed that the location was used as a “safe house” for numerous young Mexican females working as prostitutes, none of whom had legal status in this country.

Other individuals who have been arrested and charged during the course of the investigation include:

Heddell, and the New Jersey State Police, for their assistance in bringing the defendants to justice.
